

The Spanish economy has undergone a major turnaround since emerging from its worst recession in decades last summer. A marked rise in household consumption, as well as growth of the country's gross domestic product rate, is evidence that the environment has changed for the better.

A Eurostat report published earlier this month also revealed that Spain was the third biggest job creator in the Eurozone between April and June this year. As such, the number of people in work during the second quarter of 2014 compared with the first quarter grew by 0.7%, almost half a per cent more than the Eurozone average.

Despite still falling product prices and high unemployment in Spain, economists are hopeful that reforms enacted over the past two years will continue to enhance growth over the next few months.

The more positive outlook on the country's economy has further increased employer confidence in the past months. As businesses are starting to hire again, we are working more with our customers to develop innovative solutions to attract and retain talent.

Due to the momentum in the market, we are currently actively seeking to increase headcount within our Iberia division so that we have greater capability to deal the velocity of change.
